The day after Peter Brabeck's appointment as chairman of the World Economic Forum (WEF), we announced in our article that we would name the source for our statements about him. For this reason, we are sharing this interview from 2013 today. In the interview, it becomes clear that it is not ex-WEF chief Klaus Schwab, but Peter Brabeck who declares an impending water scarcity to be an "official" crisis issue.

In principle, we want to devote to people like Brabeck in this channel only as much attention as is necessary to understand what lies behind the deliberately created narrative of global water scarcity. For this reason, we reported four and a half years ago on his role as vice president of the WEF.

Our approach remains positive, informative, and solution-oriented. For us, the focus is not on power structures, but on the value of purest, clean, and toxin-free water - and the possibilities of making it accessible to all people.

Before we conclude this more unusual topic for our channel, let us digress one more time. In the article below, we show examples, projects, and perspectives in somewhat more detail than usual, demonstrating why no one should let themselves be unsettled by yet another panic campaign.

In truth, there are enough creative, intelligent people with brilliant ideas for a peaceful, just coexistence in harmony with nature. What they lack is not solutions - but visibility. They are systematically suppressed, defamed, or ignored so that the world remains in the desired light of crises.

Television, talk shows, mainstream media, many feature films, etc. serve like smoke bombs to shape the desired mass mindset.

Independent thinking, seeing, research, and communication with conscious partners are an effective antidote. Truly significant information has long not appeared in major media, but in less conspicuous sources, in a pamphlet, flyer, or simply in open conversation with people who dare to ask differently - or perhaps in a Telegram channel

The world is not yet controlled by elites - but by the decision of each individual. Whoever persistently concerns themselves with threat scenarios ensures they materialize. Whoever, on the other hand, concerns themselves with visions of a peaceful world, builds it. In response to the threats postulated by Brabeck, here are some ideas and impulses why nothing has to come about the way this billionaire would like to bring it about

It's good.
