The Mineral Water and Beverage Mafia

Investigative journalist Marion Schimmelpfennig has created what is arguably the best and an extremely impressive reference work in this field with this 386-page book. The foreword is by Dr. Rüdiger Dahlke, and he says: "Whoever reads this book cannot shake the impression that the beverage industry consciously and deliberately endangers the health and lives of its customers. Health catastrophes simply do not count against the threat of profit losses. What the mineral water and beverage industry serves up to us and is allowed to add to its products completely legally - in some cases without having to declare it - will rob you of the last shred of trust in these products. Our tap water is admittedly far from being as good as you are repeatedly led to believe, but even tap water is still healthier than most products you find on the beverage market. And it is a good basis for producing good water - if you know how. Most people by now know that plastic bottles can release hormone-like substances. But did you also know that those appetizing-looking bottles are frequently contaminated with fecal and other dangerous germs? That artificial sweeteners apparently don't make you slim, but fat? And that manufacturers enrich themselves at your expense with the cheapest possible contents?

The author delves into the murky depths of an industry exclusively oriented toward profit, one that does not care one whit about the health of its customers. An industry that has declared water to be the new oil and is determined to control water sources-and thereby life-worldwide. The author not only spoke with numerous scientists and experts to substantiate her claims, but also with Yasmine Motarjemi. Motarjemi was once positioned high at the top of the Nestlé corporation as Global Food Safety Manager. Today she is fighting against the corporation because Nestlé does not take food safety seriously enough. As a result, health-hazardous products have repeatedly reached the market, and some have even cost lives.

Read this book and protect yourself and your family, because the lobby of the mineral water and beverage mafia is worth billions and the legislator is its compliant puppet." (End of Dr. Dahlke's quote)
