Excessive Fluoride Damages Children's Development

Under his post, Robert Kennedy published an article from the British daily newspaper "The Guardian," which addressed a groundbreaking court ruling from September 24, 2024 in the United States. District Judge Edward Chen concluded that fluoridation can cause developmental damage in children and lower IQ at levels to which the public is generally exposed in drinking water. The court determined that the amounts contained in US water present an unreasonable risk.

Authorities Must Tighten Fluoride Regulations! Stuart Cooper, director of the advocacy group Fluoridation Action Network, told the Guardian: The order from the past week, which requires the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to begin tightening fluoride regulations, is a "groundbreaking" legal victory that has been long in coming. Over the past 15 years, there has been a "surge" in high-quality scientific research documenting the risks, said Michael Connett, a leading attorney for Food and Water Watch in the case. A spokesperson for a German manufacturer of high-quality reverse osmosis filters points out that it took 15 years until this groundbreaking ruling to restrict just one toxin from drinking water. However, there are countless other toxins such as microplastics, PFAS, pharmaceutical residues, hormones, fertilizers, pesticides, viruses, and numerous other contaminants in both US and European tap water, and more are being added daily. Only a high-quality reverse osmosis system actually guarantees clean, toxin-free and contaminant-free drinking water.

Kennedy (70) is a lawyer, critic of the pharmaceutical industry, environmental toxins, and more. In August 2020, he came to Berlin for a demonstration against Corona measures. He is said to play a key role in the health policy of the Trump administration. At an event in Arizona earlier this week, the former president said that Kennedy in a possible Trump administration could "do anything he wants."
